Dear Petra

I would be willing to try to put something together on this if it seems like there is something constructive we could do. It seems important to bring up sustainable design again at this point, now that the plans are a bit more settled.

Besides contacting Libeskind, the LMDC and Port Authority, I thought it might be a good idea to have some kind of green design competition, especially regarding the office buildings - which don't seem to be fully determined at this point. To capture people's attention in the same way as the previous architectural design competition. I'd be interested in hearing what others think.

I don't have the emails of all the people who might be interested. Maybe you could circulate this to others as well.

Best regards, Gail

Gail -- If people have the time to devote, I'd love for the Civic Alliance green building committee (or a new configuration of it) get back together and start pressing these very important issues. Is there interest in having a meeting/ setting an agenda?

Now that the Port Authority and the LMDC are looking to Libeskind to oversee all the development projects at the WTC site, I am wondering if it isn't an appropriate time for the Civic Alliance to press for the inclusion of sustainable design principles in the development of the site.

I'm not sure what the best way to do that is strategically, but maybe it would involve setting up a meeting with Libeskind, either separately or together with PA and LMDC representatives. Maybe also a letter that goes to a broader group, and efforts to build wider support for this sort of approach to the rebuilding process.

Please let me know what you think.
