Mike's security is all in the details

Mayor-elect Michael Bloomberg has been circled by a thick ring of NYPD security, including a beefed-up cop detail and round-the-clock guards at his Manhattan home.

Bloomberg, while campaigning, had two to four cops following him around as he bounced from borough to borough, just like rival Mark Green.

Earlier in the year, before the NYPD began protecting him, Bloomberg was guarded by at least two private security men.

But now that he's headed for the corner office at City Hall, Bloomberg's police detail has been ratcheted up to about half the size of Mayor Giuliani's squad.

Now, at least four detectives are assigned to keep 24-hour watch over the mayor-to-be, including performing advance security sweeps and driving him around.

Once Bloomberg becomes the 108th mayor on Jan. 1, the NYPD may tail him with an anti-terrorism squad.

An intimidating black Ford van filled with flak-jacketed, highly trained cops and a cache of weapons has followed Giuliani around town since shortly after the Sept. 11 attacks.

A patrol car also has been stationed outside Bloomberg's five-story Upper East Side townhouse.

Security could grow tighter on the residential block because the media mogul plans to remain at his swanky East 79th Street home instead of living at Gracie Mansion.

Under Giuliani, the NYPD pumped up security at Gracie Mansion — a safety nightmare because it's easily accessible from a public park, the street and the East River.
